TUESDAY, OCTOBER 10. 1738.

To the DAILY GAZETTEER.

October 4, 1738.

SIR,

 HAD the favour of a Letter on a very important Subject, inserted in your Paper of the 20th of last Month, for which I return you my Thanks; I never had a Line there before: Which is Answer enough to a large Share of that Scurrility published this Day (which my Letter, it seems, gave rise to) the Author of which has been pleased to consider me as a Writer in your Paper; which I assure you, I should think so far from an Undervaluation, that I should esteem it an Honour; but that the Compliment is paid me, only by a FORBESMAN, as I am told, to a Printing Press in the Old Bailey.

HOWEVER, if it may not be thought degrading too much the Gazetteer, allow me to take the Kindness it was intended; and to make my Returns in your Paper to an obscure Author, who for Years, it seems, has been talking to himself, without any Body's minding one Word he has said; or thinking it worth their While to trouble their Heads about him.

THIS poor Man seems very Angry with me at present; but for this Courtesy which I am inclin'd to shew him, and which he has been long begging from all Hands in vain, I shall expect kinder Treatment from him for the future.

In my Letter of the 20th, mentioned above, I made a Quotation from a Performance of his, which he seems determined not to forgive me: My only View in it was, to render it Beneficial to the Publick; but the doing Good seems so little his real Inclination, that he appears enrag'd at me for only endeavouring to make any thing that came from him subservient to this valuable End.

I cannot readily imagine why this Writer's Choler should rise so; I quoted him fairly enough, if not fully: 'Tis true, I made free with the Verboe and Prolif: he is so famous for, and strip'd him of his favourite Sneers, and the Scandals he had tak'd together; but tho' this was an unpardonable Fault, yet having made him do good, which I never heard he did before in his Life, he might have been more merciful to me.

I quoted, he says, but Seventy Lines; why, really, I thought Seventy Lines enough in all Conscience: I took as many as were sufficient for my Purpose; the Rubbish I left behind could not at all contribute to the End I proposed, and which, as I said before, so I say still, perhaps he did not intend they should answer PUBLICK GOOD.

THIS Man, I am told, is a little touch'd in his Head, or I should not have been able to have found out how he came to quarrel with me; because without my Help, his Performance had neither been reasonable or serviceable.

BUT if my Advice, says he, was seasonably published, from whence your Doubt of the Honesty of my Design? — Doubt of his Honesty! not a Man in Britain, I believe, doubts of his Honesty; that Point was too well secured by the Gazetteer of the 4th of July 1735, for his Honesty ever to come into Question more.

BUT it is pity to laugh too much; this luckless Mention of his Honesty was, if you will consult your Almanacks, just at the Change of the Moon: Unhappy Man! 'Tis to be supposed the Fit was but short, or we might have found him unfortunately producing a Journal of his Vagrancy through Europe, with the Government's Money he eloped with, as a Proof of it.

To this Lunary Indisposition, I would place his Endeavour to disturb the Ashes of the Dead: What Injury did the deceased Mr. Ridpath ever do him, that he should be so Unjust and Cruel, as to join him with a Woolston, in Aid of his Scurrilities? Mr. Ridpath was a Gentleman, a Scholar, and a true Friend to Liberty and to his Country, both which he not only served but suffered for: Hence the Resentment might perhaps arise; and therefore he is to be put upon the Level with a Woolston, the Ridiculer of the Miracles of our Blessed Saviour!

BEING a little Calmer, among a multitude of others which do not seem such, he desires to ask me, he says, one sober Question: 'Why, if the Advice given by him was not a Design to serve the Ministry, (he deals much in giving Advice to the Ministry) should not those Gentlemen, whom I was pleased to call his Friends, forgive him for it?' This Clencher shall have a very short Answer; it seems to require no others: I verily thought, as most Folks would have done, that those Friends, if they are such to him, would not readily forgive him such an unguarded Publication, as with great Ease might be, and was turned, tho' evidently enough against the Author's Interest.

He intreats me to let him know, who are those I called his Friends; Whether the Gentlemen in the Opposition, the Tories, who knew him too well to trust him, or the Jacobites? Now, whether these, or any of these, are his Friends, I can't take upon me to say; but thus much I may safely venture to affirm, That if the Malecontents are his Friends, there is not a Tory or a Jacobite in the Nation that is his Enemy.

BUT I will have done with him now and for ever. The Friendship of the Whigs in general he does not lay any Claim to: In return, therefore, to his many, I will offer to ask him one Question: If neither Whigs or Tories, Malecontents or Jacobites, are his Friends, for he seems to doubt if any of them are, who, in God's Name, are to cry after him, if the D——l, or the French, whom he seems so much afraid of, should run away with him? I am, Sir,

With great Respect,

Your unknown humble Servant.

To the Author of the DAILY GAZETTEER.
 SIR,
 THESE Lines were made when the Great Man was supposed to be in most Danger. The Author hath no Dependance upon, or Expectation from him; but a true Affection to his King and Country drew out these good Wishes, which you may insert in your Paper if you please.

Oct. 3. 1738.

SIR R——r, Illness all the Town divides,
 And diff'rent Vows are made by diff'rent Sides.
 Die and be d——d, the zealous Bigots say,
 To clear for J——s and Mother Church the Way!
 Others desire He yet may 'scape the Grave:
 But the same Wishes diff'rent Reasons have;
 Live to be hang'd, or give the Block his Due!
 Cries P——r, and his Vengeance-breathing Crew.
 But all true Hearts, who George and Britain love,
 Pray the Disease and Doctors quick Remove:
 And, Spite of High Church and mock Patriots Rage,
 Wish him a long, long Life, and vig'rous old Age!

Extract of a Letter from Dunkirk, dated Oct. 2. N.S. to a Merchant in Dublin.

Yesterday Morning, about two o'Clock, within a League of this Town, was lost the St. Peter, Capt. Davis, bound from Rotterdam to Dublin, laden chiefly with Bale Goods, to the Amount of 10,000 l. She struck on the Sand Banks, where she now lies under Water. How the Accident happened, the People do not very well agree in; but all the Hands are safe, tho' the Ship and Cargo are lost. Our Admiralty have taken the necessary Care to send out Boats, to try what Part of the Cargo can be saved; and whatever is got, will be taken as much Care of, as if the Proprietors were on the Spot; for there is no such thing as pilfering Wrecks here, as you have in Great Britain and Ireland.

The last French Mail brought the Paris A-la-main of Wednesday last, which mentions Advice from Rome, by Letters of the 14th ult. that Prince Corfini is continued in his Vice-royship of Sicily till further Orders; and that a Valet de Chambre of Lord Nithsdale, having obliged the Servants at Albano to release a Man that they were carrying to Prison, the Chevalier de St. George, upon Complaint made of the Matter to him, ordered that the Valet should be turned out of his Service, and taken into Custody, which being done accordingly, the Chevalier's Equerry went to the Governor's House to demand the Valet's Liberty; but not being able to obtain it, he assembled a great Number of People together, and having broke open the Prison Doors, set him at Liberty by main Force. The Chevalier de St. George being informed of this Outrage, turn'd off his Equerry, upon which he chose to fly to Naples, and since that, a good Number of the Rioters have been arrested and committed to Prison. The French King has issued an Arrêt, for putting off the Drawing of the Royal Lottery to the 29th of November next.

The Paris A-la-main concludes with pretended Advice from Vienna, that the Turks, after having invested Belgrade, had sent a great Body of Troops to lay Siege to Peterwaradin, in order to cut off its Communication with Belgrade.
